"It has often been said abroad that the Soviet Union and the Communist Party, as a matter of basic policy, envisage a continuing struggle against other systems of government unsympathetic to Communist principles, and that they will encourage by all means - not excluding force to overthrow or subvert such other societies and forms of government. In order that "western" fears of such an objective may, once for all, be set at rest it is now stated that the U.S.S.R. and the Communist Party, have no such intention - officialy or otherwise. They acknowledge that there is, indeed, an intense rivalry between two basically contrary political and economic systems, but they believe that only by example and evolution can the differences between them be resolved. However, the Soviets and Communist Party categorically deny that they will seek to overthrow, by force or otherwise, any foreign government or system but will, rather, seek to arrive, peaceably and by mutual agreement, at the means by which our rivalry can be divested of any suggestion of violence or subversion, and that modern civilization may proceed in its efforts to improve the welfare of the human race."
